

James Milton is a student at USC. Against his better judgement, he got advised late, and as a result, has a schedule that has classes taking place anywhere from 8:00AM to 3:00 PM on various days of the week. As such, parking can be a nightmare depending on when he gets to campus and where he decides to try his luck.

While his schedule isn't ideal, James is trying to analyze the patterns and determine which lots are most likely to have spots open at which times. It's been going okay for the most part.

Nevertheless, the day came when luck didn't seem to favor anyone, even the prepared, and James' usual lot was full. The security guard said something about a sports game that attracted a much bigger crowd of students than anticipated.

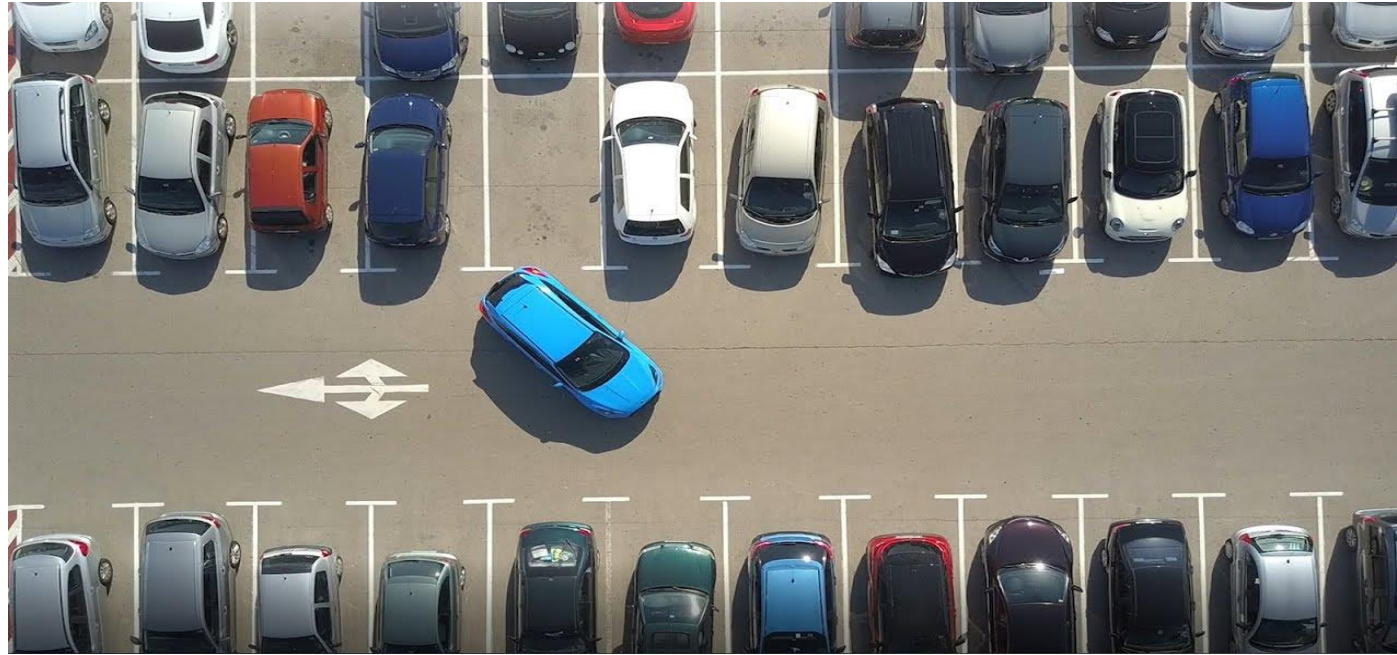

James was on the verge of panicking at this point. He had been late to his classes before, and didn't want to have to explain being late to his teacher again.

However, all of a sudden, James hears a *DING* from his phone. He looks down, and realizes that there are several spots open at AD1. His morning routine might be saved yet.

James drives over to AD1, and notices that while some of the spots he was notified about have filled up, the extra few seconds made a difference as he was able to get into a spot of his own before many other cars arrived or even thought to look.

James gets out of his car, and with just enough time to get to his class before it starts.